1. Introduction

The genre, ratings, country of production, and film length are factors that determine which movies should be hosted on an up-and-coming streaming site.

1.1. IMDb Scores by Genre

IMDb score density plots reveal that critics ratings are the highest amongst documentaries, historical, and war films, motivating the prioritisation of these genres for the streaming site. Horror films have the flattest distribution, indicating that care should be taken when selecting films from these genres.

1.2. User Scores by Genre

The reality genre of films might have the highest median user rating, but the distribution is trimodal, indicating that films should be carefully selected. Further, music, historic, and documentary films are highly rated amongst users. Since users will be the predominant viewers on the streaming site, more credence should be given to their preferences

1.3. Popularity, Ratings, and Runtime

A negative relationship exists between IMDb ratings and popularity scores. This illustrates how controversy drums attention - which should be kept in mind when curating a film catalog. Runtime is illustrated by the size of the bubbles. War films have a long duration and high popularity scores and ratings - the ideal genre.

1.4. Tile Plot of Average Rating by Country and Genre

Films primarily produced in the Phillipines in the crime, drama, science fiction and European genres have the highest average ratings. These films should be prioritised. Romance films produced in Turkey also receive high praise. Films produced in Nigeria should be avoided and Mexican films should be carefully selected to fall within the comedy and crime genres.

2. Conclusion

Across the board, war films and documentaries should be prioritised, while popular - potentially controversial - films should be promoted to stimulate interest in the streaming site. The country of production should be considered when curating the films, as this potentially serves as a proxy for quality and impacts ratings.
